Financial expert now in war zone

BEDFORD - Financial author and speaker Peter Bielas headed July 16 to the Middle East.

He'll land in Bahrain, north of Dubai, and from there takes military transport to many locations, from Djibouti, Africa, to ships in the Persian Gulf.

Last March, Bielas met with representatives from the military, and he is now making presentations on managing finances for them as well.

"Financial management is an important issue to the military," said Bielas. "Service members are under stricter rules than you and I are. If a civilian has a lot of credit card debt, many employers don't bother to check after someone has been hired. But in the military, before you can move up your security clearance, they will check your credit report. More than a few service members have lost their security clearance status because of credit card debt."

Bielas plans a two-week visit. Joining him on the trip is financial author and the host of PBS's Moneywise, Kelvin Boston, as well as several representatives from military support services.

While Bielas admits he had to look up some of the destinations on a map, he believes the trip is an important one.

Often when troops are deployed, their income goes up and expenses go down. While it may seem unnecessary to talk about personal finance on an aircraft carrier in a war zone, it is the perfect time to reach military personnel to make sure that, when they return, they put this extra money to good use.

On the other hand, reservists - and their families - are often financially stretched when called to active duty.
